The tattoo is the result of a deposit of insoluble colored pigments (or not) on the skin. These pigments form a pattern and remain permanently in the subcutaneous layer. Today, the most common technique introduces these pigments using special needles in the second layer of epithelial tissue (skin) in the dermis. But there are other techniques used, like sumi, that use bamboo instead of needles.

The tattoo first appeared among tribes and clans as a distinguishing factor of the group. This is estimated to have occurred at least 3,500 years ago.
