

Review Tinder

Tinder Inc

Tinder is one of the most fashionable flirting applications of all the available for download. The enormous number of registered users and its simplicity are undoubtedly its two great strengths

Not long ago, flirting was something that was reserved for discos, the occasional library and very crowded places, however with the passage of time and the arrival of new technologies, flirting is already possible, even using our mobile device, and any of the many applications that are available for download. Among the advantages that we find is that we can find love, without leaving home, without having to fix ourselves and without spending a single euro. The cons are also many, but we leave those for another time.

Tinder is possibly the most famous and popular application to flirt, of the increasing amount that we can find on Google Play and the App Store. The huge number of registered users and, above all, the ease of use, are its two great exponents, which have made it one of the most used methods in recent times to find a partner.

As we said, its use is extremely simple, since it will be enough to register, something that will not take you more than a couple of minutes, and start meeting people. Of course, you must "match" to start chatting. In case you have never tried Tinder, a match is the closest thing to a "Like" on Facebook, with which the other person must agree, in order to make way for a chat and who knows if love.

In addition, one of the great advantages of Tinder is that thanks to geolocation, we can order the users of the application based on distance, something really important when it comes to finding friends, a relationship or even something else. It does not make much sense, although it is not totally ruled out, trying to find a love relationship thousands of kilometers away.

Among the good things about Tinder is that it is practical and effective, that is, it is easy to open a profile and start recruiting candidates to leave. You can even choose the age range and the distance in the city of the world where you are.

You can only match a person if you like him and you like him, then they save an awkward step in the process of romance. You can always be more direct and give a superlike so that the person knows that you like immediately.

Since you have a match you can go as slow as you want and you chat in depth with the people to know their intentions before leaving, as I said you save a lot of time. Nobody gets hurt, nobody is offended, it's like a relative comfort zone.

If you like it, you like it and if you don't like it, you dislike it. In addition to being able to view thousands of profiles, there will always be someone you like and there will always be someone who likes you.

Whatever your intention on tinder even if you see it as an experiment or a game it can be a lot of fun. In the days when the day does not pay much and when you get home from work the only thing you want is Netflix. Tinder is a very good way to go out with someone.

What is wrong is that people lie a lot, they lie on their profile. they lie in their photos. they lie in their intentions and they lie in everything, the platform lends itself to it. In the profile photos they all look great but all the images have a trick, you can see their faces in half, too dark or with a lot of light, the joke is that they can meet you, not that you hide your appearance. And then there are the stuck or exhibitionists, there is nothing wrong with seeking to find someone, but is it necessary?

It is literally a catalog of people where you save the ones you like and the ones you don't because you just throw them away and to be successful on Tinder you need to spend time (time that you could well spend to meet someone face to face), many people open Tinder not for flirting, not to meet people but for the pure ego, they need likes to maintain their self-esteem.
